WHAT MAKES A GOOD PERSONAL INJURY CASE: PART 1 OF 3 (INJURIES)

BY JEFF

You can't turn on your television or radio, or drive down the street, without being bombarded with ads featuring easy-on-the-eyes twentysomethings telling you how this law firm or that law firm got them hundreds of thousands-or even millions-of dollars for their injuries. Those ads don't adequately explain the amount of work that goes into obtaining that kind of result. So, you're probably asking yourself: "what makes a good personal injury case?"

Basically, there are three factors: the injury itself, liability, and the ability to recover (a/k/a "The Deep Pocket"). This is the first in a series of three articles that will explain what makes a good personal injury case.

.The more severe or permanent the injury, the more likely that you can recover damages for what happened to you. That varies with every case. You can recover your out-of-pocket medical bills (so save your receipts), lost wages for time spent out of work (save your pay stubs), and for your pain and suffering. If you have a painful injury that prevents you from doing most, if not all, of the things that you used to do, then that injury has more value than an injury where you recovered fully in a few months.

You can even recover for future losses to your income or ability to support your family, for future medical care, and future pain and suffering.

The type of injury that leads to a large recovery is one that is life-changing. I can help you navigate the process when, in an instant, something tragic such as a crash or a fall happens. Please contact me to schedule a free consultation
